"You're wanted at the wireless, sir," he cried. "Something's happening, sir."
With the bishop and Curly at my heels, I raced forward to the little operating room. Within, the operator sat at his table, with the receiver strapped to his head, steadily writing down the words that came through the skies. Without stopping, he pushed forward a cable form. On it I read:

"Help! Help! Help! For heaven's sake, help!"

A blank line on the paper showed where the operator had sent his answer, Then came other messages from the unseen vessel.

The place was prettily decorated, but cwing to the threatening weather very little business was done. The proceeds will go toward the fund started some time ago for a new church building, the present quarters being too small.

A NOTHER morning dawned dark and laden. Far down on the southern horizon a gray cloud, denser than the rest of the sky, showed where Yucatan lay. The end of the first stage of our journey was near.

Eight bells struck as I watched, and I went aft to meet my guests at breakfast. All were there, though Curly looked as white around the mouth as his sunburnt face would permit.

"Yucatan is in sight," I announced. "We are running down on it in fine style and ought to be very close to Cape Catoche by the time we finish breakfast. After that we may pick up the Crossjack at any moment. I've given orders to the operator to beep calling her at intervals, and I guess she'll answer sooner or later."

Sir Henry asked no questions. He knew—for I had made no secret of a fact that must soon become patent—that we were trying to overtake the Crossjack in order to take off Miss Laour and her brother, but he had made 20 comment thereon. Whether this arose
